

Net neutrality, and classifying ISP's under title II, is the most fundamental function of the internet. It is not only critical for creating a level playing field for entrepreneurs, entertainers and small business, but is necessary for basic political discourse, and sharing ideas not discussed on the corporate media. If huge corporate ISP's are allowed to throttle access based on bribes, the wealthy will have even more control over our elections, and grassroots people powered democratic movements that rely on the internet will be crushed before they even sprout. Even access to facts, and the ability of the average voter to do basic research could be undermined if cash strapped political campaigns can prevent access to websites that exposing those campaigns flaws, just by paying off an ISP.

Net neutrality is a necessity, and ISP's need to remain classified under title II.
